In a study to count Africa's elephants, scientists surveyed the animals by airplane over two years.

Elephant Numbers Drop

In a new study, scientists counted Africa's elephants in eighteen countries. In 1979, they believed that only 1.3 million elephants were left there. By 2016, the numbers looked far worse.

The number of elephants in the eighteen countries has gone down to 352,271. Elephants are losing their land and hunters are killing them for their tusks. More elephants are dying than are being born. Africa's elephants are heading toward extinction, and the people who hunt them are difficult to stop.

Do You Know?

Elephant tusks are made of ivory, a valuable material in some parts of the world. Even though the trade of ivory is mostly illegal, hunters continue to kill elephants in order to sell their tusks.

If the pattern goes on, only 160,000 elephants may be left in Africa by 2025. Scientists worry that elephants will disappear from the continent. If they do, Africa's land will never be the same.
